This seminar supports graduate students in becoming feminist scholars. The focus is twofold: research methodology and professional development. Readings, discussions, and assignments are designed to help students identify research strategies suited to the questions they wish to pursue in their dissertation research and develop a scholarly, teaching, and public intellectual profile in WGS studies. Topics and central themes include: feminist epistemologies; qualitative, quantitative, and humanistic research methods; research ethics; disciplinarity and interdisciplinarity; feminist scholarship in policy and public discourse; critical perspectives on the institutionalization of WGS studies; feminist pedagogy; and, journals and publishing.

This seminar is for graduate students. The course is open to graduate students in any of Harvard’s schools. Enrollment is capped at 15 and declared Graduate Secondary Field students in Women, Gender, and Sexuality Studies receive priority admission.

Overview of course requirements

The professor will provide detailed guidelines for each assignment. Stepping-stone assignments and opportunities for peer feedback and revision are built in to the course structure. Students are encouraged to tailor assignments to their research interests and disciplines, in consultation with the professor.

Students will be assessed in three major areas:

1. Class participation
   • Attendance and participation in class and on the course discussion board. This includes attentive and engaged participation in in-class peer-review exchanges.
   • 1-page reading guide and discussion questions for one seminar session during the course of the semester, due the previous Friday and posted to the course discussion board. You can select the date of your presentation on a first-come, first-serve basis; online sign-up will begin during the first week of classes.

2. Syllabus
   • An undergraduate course proposal (1-2 pages), complete syllabus for a 12-week undergraduate seminar or lecture course, and two student assignment prompts.
   • We will workshop syllabus and student assignment drafts in class.

3. Research methods
   • A methods essay of ~10 pages (double-spaced, excluding notes and references). Draft will be workshopped in class. Depending on student stage/discipline, the format can be:
     o A dissertation proposal with an explicit focus on and critical analysis of relevant feminist research methods.
     o A methods piece on one’s own dissertation research with explicit focus on and critical analysis of relevant feminist research methods.
     o Other, with approval.
   • This assignment is supported by two scaffolding assignments:
     o A 5-page (double-spaced, excluding notes and references) “scoping” literature review of feminist and WGS scholarship in a mainstream journal in your field. Stepping stone assignment: Journal analysis worksheet due in class.
     o A short annotated bibliography of feminist methodological literature most relevant to your research (8-10 citations; bibliographies will be pooled as a class resource).
